The colour red

We live surrounded by colours. Take a minute and imagine the world around you without colours, how boring and unexciting life would be. Colours play a vital role in our daily lives. A new baby sees very little, because he can't focus his eyes well, and concentrates mostly on objects within 8 to 10 inches of his face, according to the American Optometric Association. Research suggests that red is the first colour that a baby sees. Does this mean that new parents should wear red to greet their new-borns? Not exactly. Human babies don't begin to differentiate colours until a few weeks after they are born. The first sign of this may be when a baby is fixated on something red.

Studies suggest that humans continue to have a special reaction to the colour red throughout their lives. At a young age, children learn that red is a sign of caution or danger. After all, red is the colour of blood as well as fire. Some athletes use red to intimidate their opponents. Tiger Woods wears red on the final day of his major golf tournaments. Is this because he wants to be fierce or because it's his lucky colour?

Historically, red has been associated with royalty and luck. Red carpets are laid out for celebrities and leaders before important events. Red carpets also line the entranceways to luxury hotels and restaurants. This may help guests feel more special. It may also help them spend more money. According to some studies, the colour red actually makes you hungry.
